The main report of the Hong Kong census of 1981 is in two parts. Vol. 2 contains the tables on population size, sex and age structure, fertility, mortality, and migration. The present publication, Vol. 1, consists of the analyses of these data. The analyses also take into account data from earlier censuses and changes over time in the demographic, social, and economic variables under consideration.

An attempt is made to explain the causes of these changes. The primary objective of the report is to demonstrate the utility of the statistics gathered during the course of the census and their relevance to future planning. The report includes chapters on demographic statistics, including projections; labor force characteristics; education; households; housing; internal migration and its implications; and census procedures.
