

Izumo Taisha.

It having been decided in Heaven (i.e., the home land) that the land of the rich Reed Plains should be governed by the Grandson of the Sun Goddess, two emissaries were sent one after the other to the kami who ruled the country called the "Great Name Possessor" with a request that he abdicate.

These emissaries having been unsuccessful, a more forceful method was decided upon and Futsu-nushi, a descendant of the God of Fire was placed in charge of an expedition to the islands. The second in command was Mikazuchi, the kami of boats.

They went to Izumo and presented their claims to the Great Name Possessor. ^{Onamuchi} His two sons were consulted. The elder expressed his willingness that his father should abdicate and himself committed suicide.

The younger son was not so easily disposed of. A battle was fought and this younger son and all his followers were destroyed. Having lost his two sons the great Name Possessor consented to abdicate, but with the stipulation that a great shrine should be built to his memory.

This was done. It was the starting of the great shrine of Izumo.

Izumo Taisan.

It having been decided in Heaven (i.e., the home land) that the land of the rich Reed Plains should be governed by the Grandson of the Sun Goddess, two emissaries were sent one after the other to the kami who ruled the country called the "Great Name Possessor" with a request that he abdicate.

These emissaries having been unsuccessful, a more forceful method was decided upon and Futar-nushi, a descendant of the God of Fire was placed in charge of an expedition to the islands. The second in command was Mikasugi, the kami of boats.

They went to Izumo and presented their claims to the Great Name Possessor. His two sons were consulted. The elders expressed his willingness that his father should abdicate and himself committed suicide.

The younger son was not so easily disposed of. A battle was fought and the younger son and all his followers were destroyed. Having lost his two sons the great Name Possessor consented to abdicate, but with the stipulation that a great shrine should be built to his memory. This was done. It was the starting of the great shrine of Izumo.