

The Visit.

It is the usual custom for Japanese men to call on the men of a family and the women to go separately and call on the ladies. However, our custom of husband and wife making a call together is understood over there.

Upon arriving at a Japanese home, one's shoes are removed before stepping on the polished floor [?] or the soft matting. One is shown into a reception room and seated on a little mat on the floor to await the hostess. When she enters one does not rise to greet her but she kneels and you both bow, resting the head on the hands which are extended on the floor in front one. Before bowing the little mat on which one is sitting is put to one side. As this mat corresponds to our chair the idea of removing it is the same as our custom of not remaining seated when greeting our hostess.

Refreshments of tea and cake are always offered to guests. The tea is served in little cups without handles, and one takes it with both hands, placing the left hand under the cup to guide it. The tea and cake are placed on the floor before each guest, the one served bows, placing the hands on the knees. ^{the right hand above -} ^{slightly to the side}

Upon departure [?] the hostess follows the guest to the entrance and accompanied by the household servants speeds the parting guest with bows while kneeling on the floor.

Shoes are replaced and farewell bows are made.

The Visit.

It is the usual custom for Japanese men to call on the men of a family and the women to go separately and call on the ladies. However, our custom of husband and wife making a call together is understood over there.

Upon arriving at a Japanese home, one's shoes are removed before stepping on the polished floor or the soft matting. One is shown into a reception room and seated on a little mat on the floor to wait the hostess. When she enters one does not rise to greet her but she kneels and you both bow, resting the head on the hands which are extended on the floor in front one. Before bowing the little mat on which one is sitting is put to one side. As this mat corresponds to our chair the idea of removing it is the same as our custom of not remaining seated when greeting our hostess.

Refreshments of tea and cake are always offered to guests. The tea is served in little cups without handles, and one takes it with both hands, placing the left hand under the cup to guide it. The tea and cake are placed on the floor before each guest, the one served bows, placing the hands on the knees.

Upon departure the hostess follows the guest to the entrance and accompanied by the household servants speeds the parting guest with bows while bowing on the floor. Shoes are replaced and farewell bows are made.

Supply the main bows while bowing on the floor.

