Election Trouble

A nasty rumor has been going around concerning the coming election. It seems that there are a couple of class officers for which no candidate has filed a petition; and that there are a couple of spots with only one candidate in the running. Several people, seeing these uncontested offices, have quite naturally been taken with the idea of running for these jobs.

Upon checking, these Johnny-come-lately candidates have been informed by the student body office that a nomination from the floor in a class meeting would suffice to put their name on the ballot. This, whether the student body office realizes it or not, is a clear-cut violation of the constitutional interpretation.

The four classes have no constitutions of their own; so they are, by precedent if not by rule, subject to the election rules set forth in the ASOSC constitution. The ASOSC constitution states clearly that, to run for an office, a candidate must file a duly constituted petition, with the proper number of signatures affixed, at least four days before the primary election.

Write-in candidacies, of course, are always possible, and are not eliminated by this interpretation. But it is not all right to put anyone's name on the ballot for any office who has not fulfilled the requirements set forth by the constitution.

To put someone's name on the ballot just because he was nominated from the floor would be a serious injustice to the candidates who have already gone to all the work of getting their petitions signed—and, much worse, it would, by flaunting precedent, cast a bad light on the entire election.

The elections setup is at fault in two different ways. First, there are no class restrictions, and nowhere, as far as we've been able to find out, is there a black-and-white rule that says that the classes shall adhere to the ASOSC constitution. Pretty confusing, since that's the way it's always been done. Second, the student body office, by announcing earlier that the petition deadline would be Tuesday afternoon, and by not saying anything to lead potential candidates to believe that the petition requirement would be waived for class officer aspirants, left themselves wide open for hard feelings from the candidates who did file proper petitions in time for the deadline.

The way we see it, people who are nominated from the floor at class meetings are nothing more than suggested and announced candidates for write-in votes. They have not fulfilled one of the announced requirements for getting on the ballot, and they have no right to have their name there.

The student body office and the elections committee are, to be sure, within their rights. There's nothing strictly illegal about what they are doing. But it doesn't jibe with what's been done in the past, and they've never announced that they planned to deviate from past procedure. It would seem that their obligation to play fair with the unchallenged candidates should offset any desire to fill up the ballot. Their announced intention to ignore precedent will tend to reduce the status of class officer positions to that of a scrap of paper. The people who turned in their petitions will howl, and we don't blame them.

Students Cheat

Wednesday's International week convocation was great. The speaker, his subject, his speaking, his ideas, the audience reception of the speech were all excellent. Everything about the convo was great . . . except the size of the audience.

No topic could be found for a speaker that should be of more concern to every student and staff member at Oregon State than "Soviets in World Affairs." Although this subject, one of the most vital in our present world, should be of interest to 100 percent of the students, fewer than 20 percent of the OSC student body went to the coliseum to hear the convo.

We think that Louis Fischer presented the best convo speech given at OSC this year from the standpoint of speaking ability and significance of topic. Every college student to be a truly educated person should have broader interests and experiences than those that can be offered by the classroom alone.

All we can say is that those students and faculty members who could have attended the convo and didn't cheated themselves by missing a good speech. They also cheated those who do support convocations by making it highly unlikely that the administration will continue to bring outstanding speakers to the campus for convocations.
